ELIO’S LITTLE DISCOVERIES

Two Sides of the Fence

The old apple tree stood on the fence line, its branches reaching over both gardens. On Elio’s side, its shade fell across the bench where Mum liked to sit.

On the other side of the fence lived an old badger called Tam. His vegetable bed began right at the fence, in the deep shadow of the tree.

Tam came to the gate with a basket of small, pale cabbages and set it on the fence rail. “These are all I have this year,” he said.

“The tree takes my sun,” said Tam. “My cabbages by the fence stay small and pale, while the ones at the far end grow big.”

Mum looked at the bench under the leaves. “On a hot day, that shade is the only cool place we have,” she said. “I sit here every afternoon.”

Bori stood between them with her wings out. “The tree was here before the fence,” she said. “It should stay just as it is, every branch.”

Elio walked slowly along Tam’s bed. The cabbages near the fence were small and pale, while the ones at the far end were twice as big.

He walked back and sat on the bench in the cool shade. The leaves made a green roof over his head, and he did not want the branches cut.

“We cannot both have all of it,” said Mum. “But we can have some.” She went to the shed and brought out the long-handled pruning saw.

Tam pointed to the branch that hung over his bed. Mum used the long-handled saw from the ground, and the low branch came away.

The bench still had shade in the afternoon. On the other side, Tam’s bed had sun for most of the day, and the cabbages lifted their leaves.

In spring, Tam planted his cabbages two steps back from the fence. “Now we both have some,” said Bori, and the apple tree stayed where it was.
