On the top step stood a basket of red apples. Elio swept the path, Bori stacked the flower pots, and Mum carried out the washing.

A gust of wind lifted the cloth on the basket like a small sail. The basket tipped over, and red apples rolled down every step.

Everyone talked at once. “The wind did it!” said Bori. “My broom touched something,” said Elio. “I put the basket too near the edge,” said Mum.

Later they told it again, and the stories did not match. Elio said he had been at the far end of the path, and Bori said he had been beside the steps.

“One of us must be wrong,” said Bori. “Or we each saw a different part,” said Mum. “Let us draw what we saw, and then compare.”

Bori drew a basket with the cloth standing up like a sail. She had looked up at the exact moment she heard the gust of wind.

Elio drew his broom beside the step. He had felt a small knock through the handle, but he had not even turned his head to look.

Mum drew the basket on the very edge of the top step, where she had set it down in a hurry before carrying the washing.

They laid the three drawings on the kitchen table in a row. First the edge, then the gust, then the broom, in the order they happened.

“All three happened,” said Elio, putting a pebble on each drawing. “The basket was already on the edge. The wind pushed it. My broom finished it.”

Nobody had lied, and nobody had seen the whole thing. Bori stacked the three drawings and put them carefully on the kitchen shelf, where anyone could look.

Now the basket of apples sat on the flat stone, away from the step. “That is the true story,” said Mum, “or at least most of it.”
