ELIO'S LITTLE DISCOVERIES

Same Stars, Different Names

같은 별, 다른 이름

On the warmest evening of summer, Mum spread a blanket on the slope behind the cottage. Elio and Bori lay on their backs. The sky was turning dark, and the first six stars had come out, close together in a little group.

“A fish!” said Elio, pointing. “Look, it is jumping. The top one is its nose, and the two at the bottom are its fins.” Bori looked hard at the same stars. “That is not a fish,” she said. “That is a duck, flying home.”

Elio pointed harder. “Look! Can’t you see it?” Bori pointed as well, and a paw and a wing crossed in the dark. From where each of them lay, the other seemed to be pointing at quite different stars.

“The two bottom stars are the fins,” said Elio. “No, they are the feet,” said Bori. They were talking about the very same stars, but each star had a different job in each picture.

Mum came back with six white pebbles from the garden. “Let’s bring the stars down where we can all see them,” she said. Together they set the pebbles out on the dark blanket, copying the group above.

Elio traced his fish in the air just above the pebbles: nose, back, belly, fins. Bori watched his paw. “Oh,” she said slowly. “Now I can spot your fish.” Then she traced her duck, and Elio found it as well.

Now they could each see both pictures, and that made it worse. “But which one is it really?” asked Bori. “It cannot be a fish and a duck at once.” Elio frowned at the pebbles. He wanted one answer too.

Mum lay back on the blanket. “Look closely,” she said. “Are there any lines up there?” They looked. There were six bright points and a great deal of dark sky. “We are the ones who add the lines,” said Mum.

“When I was your age,” Mum said, “I had a name for these six: the Kettle. My mother showed me the spout and the handle.” Elio and Bori looked again. Then, all at once, they could see a kettle too.

Bori giggled. “You found a fish because you think about fish all day,” she told Elio. “And you found a duck,” said Elio, “because you are one.” Mum smiled. “The pictures we find in the stars can say something about us.”

“Can it be anything, then?” asked Elio. “A spoon?” They tried. A spoon needed only some of the stars, and two were left over. “A good name uses all six,” said Bori. The fish, the duck and the Kettle all did.

They went back down to the cottage with three names for one group of stars. Halfway down, Elio turned and looked up. “Tomorrow,” he said, “let’s choose new stars and name them together.”
