ELIO'S LITTLE DISCOVERIES

The Box with Two Plans

상자 하나, 두 가지 생각

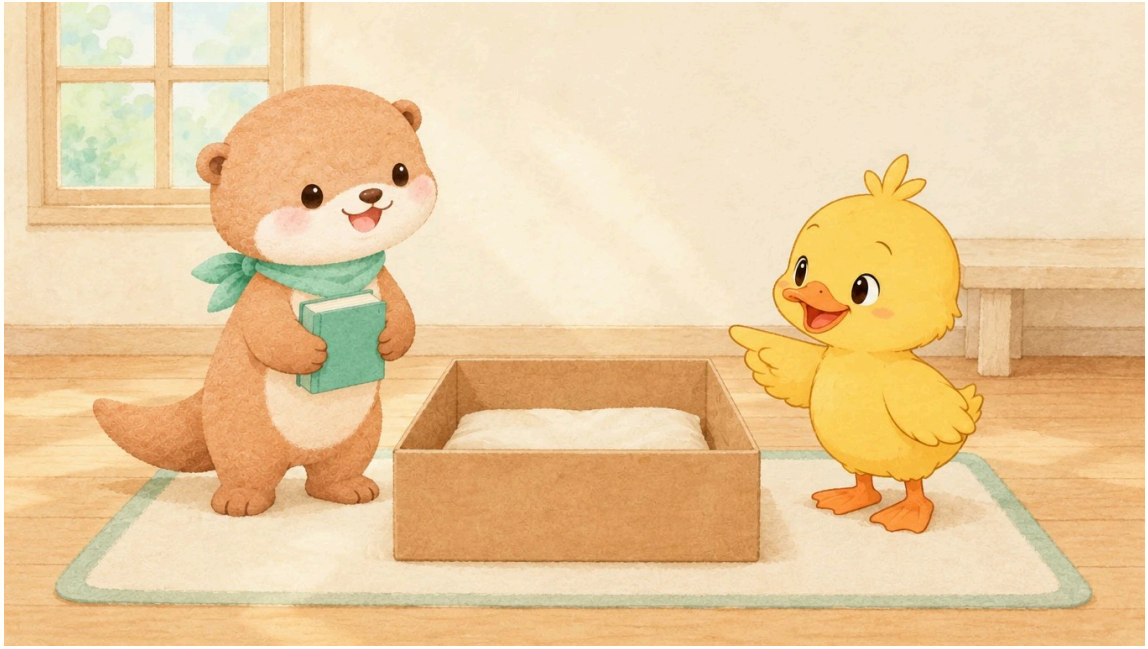

나무 · 함께 읽기 · 12장면

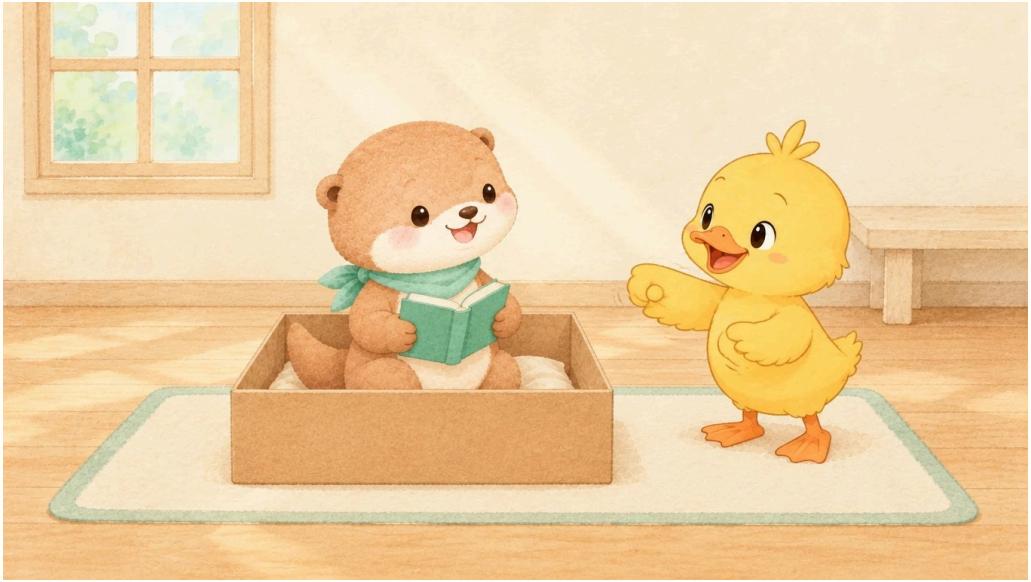

Elio found an empty box on the mat by the window. It was wide enough to sit in, with four low sides and no lid. He looked from the box to his book. A reading corner, he thought. A place of my own.

He put a soft cushion inside and pressed it flat. Then he carried over his green book. The room was bright, but the little space inside the box felt tucked away. Elio was just about to sit down when Bori came in.

“A boat!” said Bori, stopping beside the mat. “Where shall we go?” Elio looked at the same four sides. He could see a quiet corner. Bori could see the start of a journey. Neither of them had moved the box.

Elio sat on the cushion and opened his book. Beside him, Bori spread her wings like oars. “Swish, swish! Here comes a wave!” Elio read the first line twice. The pretend sea was growing louder, and his reading corner was getting smaller.

“Wait,” Elio said, closing the book on his knees. “I wanted a quiet place to read.” Bori lowered her wings. “I wanted to take a trip.” They looked at the box again. One box could hold two ideas, but the ideas needed room.

“You could try your boat first,” said Elio. “Then I would like a quiet turn.” He climbed out with his book. The cushion stayed inside. Bori waited until Elio stood beside the mat, then stepped into the box. Nothing had to be rebuilt.

Bori sat down and rowed with her wings. Elio stood beside the boat, holding his book. “A big wave!” she called. He lifted one paw and made a slow wave in the air. The floor stayed dry. Only their story was at sea.

Soon Bori stopped rowing. “Where are we going?” she asked. She had a boat, a cushion and a very good sound for splashing. She did not yet have a destination. Elio looked down at the book in his paws. “We could find one here.”

He opened the book, but Bori leaned forward before he began. “Could I listen from the boat?” Elio thought about the swishing wings and the first line he had read twice. “Yes, if the sea can be quiet while I read.” Bori folded her wings.

Elio sat on the mat beside the box and began again. Bori listened from the cushion. When he paused, she asked where the little boat in their new story might go next. Elio pointed to the page. “Let us see what this part tells us.”

After a while, Bori stepped out. “Your quiet turn,” she said. Elio settled into the box with the book. Bori sat beside him instead of rowing. For a moment, neither friend spoke. The same four sides made a small, comfortable corner.

At the end, they sat on the mat with the open book between them. The box was still a box, and the cushion was still inside it. “Tomorrow?” asked Bori. “We can make a new plan,” said Elio. Today, they had found room for both.
