Mum laid a green kite on the garden table. A blue ribbon lay beside it, and Bori had brought a yellow one. Elio ran a paw along the smooth paper. “A kite for me,” he said. He was already imagining it in the sky.

Elio chose the blue ribbon, and Mum fastened it to the kite. He picked up a wooden reel and wound the loose string around it. Bori lifted her yellow ribbon. “Can it have this one too?” Elio looked at the blue tail. “It already has one.”

Bori lowered the yellow ribbon. She had chosen it because it looked like a little piece of sunshine. Mum held the kite steady. “Would another colour fit?” she asked. Elio looked from the green paper to Bori. There was plenty of room.

“A blue tail and a yellow tail,” said Elio. “You can choose one too.” Mum tied the yellow ribbon beside the blue one. Bori held the two tails together. They were different colours, but both belonged to the same kite.

They carried the kite to the open grass. Mum held its frame while Elio unwound a short length of string. Bori stood beside him. Everything seemed ready. But when they looked up, the kite was still in Mum’s paws. The two bright tails hung straight down.

“Perhaps it is broken,” said Elio. He wanted to pull harder, but Mum asked him to stop and look. “What can you see moving?” Elio looked at the grass. Bori looked at the ribbons. Nothing moved. Even the little leaves beside the path were still.

Bori gave one small flap. The yellow ribbon stirred and fell quiet again. Elio watched it settle beside the blue one. “That was you,” he said, smiling. Bori folded her wings. They could make a little movement, but they could not make the whole meadow windy.

Mum lowered the kite onto the grass, and they sat nearby. Elio kept the reel beside his feet. Waiting felt longer when he stared at the empty sky. So he chose a tall blade of grass, and Bori chose the two ribbons. “We will watch together,” she said.

After a while, the tall grass bent. Elio noticed it first. Then Bori saw the ribbons lift away from the green paper. “Look!” she called. Mum picked up the kite by its frame. This time, the two tails moved before anyone gave them a flap.

Mum held the kite above her head. Elio let out a little string, and the green shape lifted into the breeze. The blue tail curled one way and the yellow tail curled the other. Bori watched them rise together. Neither colour had to disappear to make room.

Elio looked at the reel in his paws. He had wanted the kite all to himself, but Bori had helped him see when the breeze arrived. “Would you like a turn?” he asked. Bori stepped closer. Mum stayed beside them while Elio passed over the reel.

“Whose kite is it now?” asked Mum. Bori watched the two tails above them. “It has my yellow one.” “And my blue one,” said Elio. Then he moved close enough to help her hold the reel. “A kite for us,” he said. Mum smiled. “All three of us.”
